Description Trackers Files 6 Comments 0 Download Update Seeds & Leechers Stat.Three developments in different circumstances have contributed to the current role of the state in allowing the sexual abuse of women by male adults: The first, beginning in the 1970s, was a feminist response to the apparent “victim-blaming” that was occurring in the legal system in rape cases. The second was a change from a belief that the state had to protect women to one that the state had a duty to protect women from assault. This latter belief was reflected in changes in the law and in the organization of criminal justice and justice policies on the state level. The third has been the shift to a “zero tolerance” or “no means no” approach. This approach, while reflecting an increase in the effectiveness of the criminal justice system, has created difficulties for women, because “no means no” requires women, who make up a majority of college students, to say “no” when faced with sexual pressures, even if the women say “yes” to the “request” for sex; or, in the absence of “no”, to avoid reporting the assault. Thinking about the first two points, the official attitude towards women as well as the actions of men, changes. The focus of legal
