The elk testis proteome: detection of at least two cysteine proteinase inhibitors. Recently, we have initiated a proteomic analysis of the elk (Cervus elaphus) testis, and identified for the first time multiple aspartic proteinase inhibitors (Asp-I) in testis tissues. In the present report, we demonstrate that Asp-I are a ubiquitous feature of elk testis proteome. A total of 11 different proteinase inhibitors were detected, with six of them having the highest relative abundances. At least two of the Asp-I genes are located within the same chromosomal region of the elk genome, indicating their close evolutionary relationship. All protease inhibitors present in elk

Nicholas, a candidate for re-election as the county commissioner in a precinct of Ulster County, said he had an interest in the matter, and that, too, would have influenced his vote. The superior court judge acted as prosecutor in the case, when he took in the county officers and candidates to observe the method of election used in the county. The contest in that election, however, came down to 2d92ce491b
