The Department of Justice is suing to block the enforcement of the Affordable Care Act's Medicaid expansion before it launches, the Washington Examiner reported Wednesday. The federal government is legally bound to expand the coverage through programs like Medicaid, the federal insurance program for low-income people. But under President Donald Trump, federal officials have said they won't enforce the 2010 law that originally imposed that requirement. The lawsuit challenges a previous finding by the Department of Health and Human Services that the expansion is constitutional. If accepted, the lawsuit would remove the legal framework that forced states to accept the Medicaid expansion. It would also leave private insurers to absorb the cost for those newly insured people, which amounts to $10 billion for states that accepted the expansion. Related: 7 ways the Republican health care plan would cost you The lawsuit from the DOJ, and the president's stated intent to deny the coverage, appears to be aimed at stopping the newly covered people from buying private insurance and subsidizing the costs of private insurance companies, according to Alan Daul, a partner at Epstein Becker & Green in Washington, D.C. "They're more or less going to have to pay the costs themselves," he said. "So the states aren't going to necessarily be able to pass on the costs as they do now." The size of the lawsuit remains unclear, but the DOJ is expected to seek a temporary restraining order to block the government from enforcing the law's requirements while the court decides the case. It's unlikely to be the only lawsuit against the law.
