A: It is not a Windows installer. It is a Linux installer. See the eset website. If you are using a Mac, then you will have to use a Linux distribution and the Linux installer that you downloaded from the eset website. You can look into the README.txt file to know the exact commands you have to run and the packages you need for that version.

Don't forget the following command before you start any of the following commands: `sudo apt-get install libapt-pkg4.12` That command downloads the required packages. If you are using Linux Mint, then you may have to download different packages. As simple as that. The best thing you can do is to install both the programs at the same time. If you do not have enough space on your hard disk, then use a USB flash drive. Q: XPages How to set the timezone in XPages?

I would like to set the timezone of my XPage and my session. I found out that in XPages there is a way to set the timezone in the view but I'd like to set it globally. Is it possible to do so? In a Java Script method I tried it like this: `var time = new Date();`

`time.setTimezone("Europe/Berlin");` This line gets me the GMT-time. I tried it with the following code: `var sessionScope = session.getScope("session"); var timeZone = new Date(); timeZone.toLocaleTimezone(sessionScope.getClientInfo());` This doesn't get me the correct timezone. A: You have to create the Date object with the desired timezone: `var date = new java.util.Date(); date.toString();` Thus you can set the timezone to your XPages view: You can then set the value of your sessionScope: `var sessionScope = session.getScope("session"); sessionScope.setAttribute("viewDate", date.getTime());` You would then set the timezone in your webapp with the timezone browser element like this: 3da54e8ca3
