Why use a header file for the class? Should I use only one #include for the header or include it in every file that uses it? A: Do you include the header file in the cpp file, or the cpp file in the header file? It's somewhat a matter of taste. For example, in your particular case, it would be better to include the header in a.cpp file instead of the header file because it is better suited for compilation units that are independent from each other. So that a header file is just a file you need to include in multiple.cpp files, but the cpp file is compiled and linked with every compilation unit that uses it. (For example, if there is an extern "C" definition in the header file, it will not be visible to C++ translation units, which means that you cannot define objects of that type using C++ code. But the header file is still included by all translation units that need that type and defines all names.) Why use a header file for the class? You might think you have many files including
