Wrens are a family of brown passerine birds in the predominantly New World family Troglodytidae. The family includes 88 species divided into 19 genera. The wrens have their origins in North America; this family originated in the New World but the earliest known modern birds are New World species. Wrens are found on all continents apart from Antarctica and their distribution is centered on the New World. Most species are small or medium-sized and most are insectivores. The wrens are a familiar and often common sight in countries around the world, with 75 species having become naturalised in countries outside their native range. The wrens generally live in a variety of habitats, including forest, forest edge, and open country. Wrens are omnivorous, and many species show territorial behaviour. They adapt their behaviour to the local conditions and will nest in a variety of habitats. Wrens tend to excavate their nests in loose soil and crevices in rock. They also often nest in buildings and make various adaptations. Wrens are either active or perching birds. In many species, the call is loud and harsh, sometimes similar to that of a jay or mockingbird. The female commonly sings while incubating and after the chicks hatch. This is also true of some ground-dwelling species, such as the kiwi and the Australian brush-turkey. The song of the male is very varied and complex, often with a rhythmically steady beat. The nest is abandoned after the chicks are fed for the first time, and the female usually sings on the nest a few days more. They start to hop soon after their second month. One of the best known wrens is the wren, Troglodytes hie maller and include the American wren. These are very similar to true wrens, but not all of them have the long tail of the true wren. Wrens are collectively known as chats, because they call in the early evening, as a united chorus. The male's song is very loud.
