(Iridaceae) is well known for its medicinal properties such as antinociceptive, analgesic, antiepileptic, antipyretic, antioxidant, anti-inflammatory, antidiabetic, anti-ulcer, antihypertensive and so on. This study was designed to evaluate the effects of oral administration of crocin, a major effective compound of C. sativus L. root, on hematological parameters in rats. Crocin (40mg/kg BW) in different doses were administered orally for 21days. The results showed that administration of crocin caused significant reductions in absolute and relative spleen and bone marrow weights in a dose-dependent manner, and elevations in the levels of serum TNF- α . The alterations in erythrocytes and platelets in crocin-treated rats were also evaluated. Compared with the control group, the significant reductions in absolute and relative spleen and bone marrow weights were significantly restored to normal levels in low doses of crocin-treated rats. However, administration of crocin caused significant elevations in the levels of serum TNF- α . Moreover, a significant decreases in the absolute and relative spleen and bone marrow weights and absolute and relative thymus, and bone marrow cell numbers, and a significant increases in the levels of serum TNF-α were shown in high dose of crocin-treated rats. These results suggest that an excess of crocin might cause liver injury. The results also indicated that the liver and spleen are the main targets of crocin-induced toxicity. 1.
