It's used extensively by many online services and is also the most common format for print. It's a common photo editor and publishing format, and it's the most popular format for sharing images online. JPEGs can be huge in size and can also become very large over time. For example, a JPEG photo taken with a DSLR can be 2–4 MB. If you resize it, it can become 16+ MB. I cannot count how many hours I've spent working on an image only to find that it was quite simply too big for a web page. JPEGs have a few issues, both in terms of their file size and their loss of image quality.

were to encounter toxic contaminants in some areas, it's unlikely that humans would have survived. "If we had encountered man-made stone contaminants, that would have been okay for us because we would have evolved stone resistant genes that eliminated the problem," says Gregory Payne, an ecologist and geologist at Scripps Institution of Oceanography in San Diego, CA. Payne says the difficulty in pinpointing exactly where Cretaceous dinosaurs lived is due to the fact that they had limited movement compared to modern animals. He says some dinosaurs could have been all-purpose scavengers, which would have drawn them to locations with the most food. "There are a lot of places that they could have gone," says Doug Wolfe, a paleontologist at the University of California, Berkeley. Credit Billy Stickland, AP A Lifeless Time The result of the dinosaur fossils that remain is a collection of intriguing landscapes, created by hordes of plants and herbivores, but also by dinos themselves. It's a landscape that became covered over with sediment and eventually fossilized in place. The sediment build-up eventually preserved the land surface's original topography—like a dino-era Earth impression. This preserved landscape has become something of a new frontier for scientists. The bones of these long-extinct creatures also fossilize, and although it's impossible to determine how a dinosaur lived or migrated, scientists can read the history of these regions in the bones. The Cretaceous landscape is like an archaeological site hidden deep within the Earth. As paleontologists continue to dig deeper and deeper, they're finding more dinosaur skeletons everywhere they look. The only problem is, these fossils are getting harder to find. That's because when sediment, like fine-grained clay, blankets over fossils, it effectively erases the bones. Back then, the best way to find fossils was to dig them out. But when excavators dig deeper than around six feet, they start encountering more sediment, which makes getting to fossil bones more difficult. Sometimes, they can't find them at all. So, scientists are turning to satellite imagery to get a look at the landscape. Aerial images from commercial cameras allow scientists to generate 3-D
