"People who are highly satisfied with their jobs report better levels of physical and mental health, higher level of workplace safety, more inclusive leadership, more effective meetings, higher levels of commitment to the organization and higher levels of workplace solidarity. We think about these things as the "soft factors" of work, but they're significant," said Ethan Leiserowitz, director of the Center for Talent and Organization at the University of Pennsylvania and one of the creators of the study. Leiserowitz said that job satisfaction is often under valued by workers and employers, but he thinks that there are definite benefits to having a job that is comfortable and rewarding, even when it's not one you enjoy. "It's not that we didn't know that job satisfaction was important," Leiserowitz said. I suggest that under this statute when the testator's will reads: "I give and bequeath to my daughter, Carrie Worthington, the sum of $10,000.00," and the testator says: "I want to make it conditional, and if my daughter Carrie would agree to let me have the residue of her estate at a certain time, I want to make it conditional, I will leave her $10,000.00 in the alternative, at the time when the residue of my estate, if Carrie would agree to relinquish the residue, then Carrie would receive the $10,000.00," and so forth, under these circumstances, this is a conditional gift. If it is conditional, then we have to ask: On what condition? Did he say in the instrument that I want to give it conditional upon my daughter agreeing to relinquish her residue? I suggest that he did not say that, and if he had said so, it would be a specific gift. If he had said it, the testator would not have been able to revoke it.
