The present invention relates to a thermal bubble jet printer which prints by heating a recording medium to cause a colorless or slightly colored ink to be jetted through a nozzle. In a thermal bubble jet printer according to the prior art, a large number of heat sensitive resistors or the like are arranged in a direction perpendicular to a direction in which recording is effected on a recording medium to form a heating device in which a plurality of heat sensitive resistors are united to form a heating element (to be called the array type). A pressure chamber capable of containing ink is formed in a part of the heating element, and a nozzle communicates with the pressure chamber. In the case where a linear array type is adopted, each resistor is divided into segments and the segments are arranged in parallel with each other. When such a conventional thermal bubble jet printer is provided with a plurality of heating elements, in the case where ink of the same color is applied to the whole recording medium, printing is effected for each heating element, and hence ink is uniformly distributed on the entire surface of the recording medium. However, since the recording medium is subjected to printing for each heating element, when a large number of heating elements are used, a driving time necessary for a print cycle is disadvantageously increased. The reason for this will be explained below. It is noted that a time taken for a printing cycle in the conventional thermal bubble jet printer corresponds to a time t_1 from a time t_0 when an ON-pulse is applied to a heating element until a print signal is input to the heating element. That is, the print cycle is longer than a time t_2 taken from a time t_0 when a print signal is input to the heating element until a print signal is input to
