You don't need to own Photoshop (or be willing to spend that kind of money) to start creating great images. You can start creating beautiful images just using Photoshop Elements. Let's get started! How to use Photoshop Elements 11 Step 1: Open the Photoshop Elements 11 application. Click on the Photoshop Elements icon on the taskbar. Alternatively, you can find the application in the Start Menu under the Programs group. Step 2: When the program opens, look for the "Create a New Canvas" button. If you don't have one, select "Create a New Canvas." Step 3: Click on "Create a New Image" to create a new image. A new image is created. Step 4: Now drag a photo or clip from your computer onto the new image. You can select multiple images, use the keyboard, or the print button to select a file from your computer or network. Step 5: This is an important step. Because you will be adjusting the camera settings, you must make sure that the original image is saved as a JPEG or other supported format. Note: Even when the image is saved to your computer as a RAW file, you must save it as a JPEG or other 05a79cecff

Q: Is there a name for what these indices and graphs represent? I'm new to graph theory, and one of my first steps is to pick up a book on Graph theory so I can better understand the various types of graphs. On the following picture, I don't know how I should name the indices and I feel this is a very common operation. A: The number 2 in the top left corner, to the right of S_i , is meant to be equivalent to S_{i-1} . So $S_{i=2}$ means that the first thing you want to look at is $S_{(i-1)}$ -th element. What could possibly go wrong in the world of animal research? For a couple of researchers in Monash University's Department of Microbiology, their official question is: "What's your degree in?" Biology student Justin Lee and masters graduate Max Dey of the department, together with study group leader Daniel Lee, have formed No Animals in Research (NAR), an initiative that would force animal researchers to complete a one-year degree course before conducting any experiments. It would be completely voluntary for researchers, though some who are affiliated with the university would be forced to complete it. While the sentiment that comes from the group's name is understandable, the reality of the proposal is quite a different one – in fact, one that completely changes its purpose and the fundamental purpose of the university. "I've been studying the ethics of animal research for a while now," Max Dey told The AJN. "I got really passionate about it." "The problem is, it has been impossible to get the university to implement any sort of animal research policy," the man currently heading the No Animals in Research group explained. According to Dey, he and his colleagues are worried that although the community may want to see the end of animal research, there may not be any concrete steps towards achieving that goal. After speaking with the student leaders of the university's animal advocacy group, then, "we thought, 'why not us?'" The group decided to spread the word about its proposal. It begins with surveys of university administrators. Any researchers who agree to complete the degree are informed that they will be given additional research funding. "If you don't do it, we are going to put you under the microscope

Q: What is the difference between Hibernate Session.flush and Session.close? I'm looking at the code in hibernate-core (v3.6). In the code I found the following session methods: public void flush() public void close() public void restore() What's the difference between them? And how can you tell which one to call, for example, in an application? A: Flush means making sure all state in the session object is flushed to the underlying DB. Close closes the connection. In the case of session bound beans, the backing session should be flushed after loading, passing the DAO, in order to make sure the session ends in a state that is correct even if an error occurs in the DAO. The session should also be closed after that point, in order to prevent the session from leaking state information. As to the question of which method to use, it is certainly better to call flush.close rather than close, but it depends on what you are doing and what exceptions are thrown. flush would preserve your original detached state. close would prevent persistence. A: Hibernate Sessions Flush or commit session. "Flush" here means to make sure your session state is consistent with your transaction state, and to put your session state (such as current/transaction state, dirty state, etc.) onto the database in order to be persistent. "Commit" here means to commit the dirty state, if any, to the underlying database. Why Flushing You can flush the session if you want to persist the state of your objects and that state is not part of the default transaction. If you don't flush the session, the state of your objects may be lost. Also, the underlying database might be lost, if you delete them. Why Committing Generally, you only commit the session if you need to persist the state of your objects. The state of your objects may have come from other sessions, so it would be inappropriate to delete data that was generated through those other sessions. Implementation Notes It's important to note that you don't have to explicitly commit the transaction. Hibernate will still put the commit command onto the underlying connection
