Episode 1.37: The week is upon us. It's been a long week after a long month and things are finally starting to settle in. With the actual time period of the movie (and the reason why it took place in the 1800's) it's been interesting seeing more familiar faces come into play (and then some). The really interesting thing is that this episode is going to be pretty much entirely in reference to the pilot of the Season. The real episodes are going to start coming out and we'll post the beginning of that series when it does. Be sure to look for: Analysis of the use of the diamond story Re-contextualization of that story to what happened in the plot that ensued Overview of the important events that led to the station's default Do you know what this is? Pawnbroker's Puzzle Piece Various ways to tell the time in the 1800s Why is that story in the pilot? Yea, there's going to be spoilers. One of the big scenes that's coming up, will be an excerpt from the pilot of the second season. To prepare for the premiere of this episode we've been playing around with the rules and writing ideas. The first time we did it was with the rules from Days of our Lives and this time, we've chosen to go with the less-well-known rules from Steel Magnolias. In any case, here they are: How to Write a Playlet Stage Directions The Stage Directions are those instructions which tell the player where to be and what to do during their action. They are also a great place to write interesting and important things to happen, such as character motivation. The standard stage directions are: Have your character enter/exit through door Make changes to the environment Place/remove prop Show dialogue Show a changing emotion Show character Have characters interact We're going to tackle these one at a time over the next few days. How to Write a Playlet: The first part of this (which is really what this blog entry is about) is about HOW to write a playlet. These are the most basic part of a script, what is usually thrown together in less than five minutes and is usually
