Q: In a set based multi-player game, is it worth using multiplayer persistence? I'm fairly new to Unity and probably have a great deal to learn about implementing a multiplayer strategy game. I recently did something while designing my game to make it, game logic wise, more suitable for multi-player, rather than limiting myself to a single player experience. I'm wondering if I'm heading in the right direction, or if I've probably produced an unmaintainable mess. The aim of my approach is to have a game that is, in multiplayer mode, editable by players (as I'm thinking of the game as one where players can write to each other's worlds and share the results), but also very neatly scalable to allow multiple instances of the game to run on each machine. This allows for multiple players to play on one machine as the game's data is present on a network drive. I'm thinking about game logic like: User A has spawned a new game instance (and therefore wrote their own save file), but they are waiting for player B to join. User B has spawned a new game instance (and therefore wrote their own save file), but they are waiting for player C to join. Basically this approach means that any one player can essentially make modifications to the game, but if another joins it shouldn't affect the save file. I'm not sure if this approach would scale up to multiplayer and I'm worried that it might be overly complex for a beginner (like myself). I also worry that I'm having trouble imagining how to implement a multiplayer game using this model. Have I gone the right direction with this approach? Or am I trying to solve a problem that I simply can't? A: yes you go the right direction. But you also have to think of the design to make the development easier for yourself and future developers. There are two parts that I think of Design of the application Implementation of the application The Application design is the conceptual design, you should try to think of the features in the application, how the players would interact with it (often you have to think about how a user will jump in a level, your should also have a list of items that you need to carry, or what kind of weapons you can use), try to map all this features to a time line or a task so you can get a rough idea of how to develop the application.

The Red Blog's Top 10 Most Popular Articles of 2014 For a while now we've been tracking the number of readers who visit the site. It's a measure of how many people have become interested in the issues Red state workers, students and their families face in Maryland. What you'll see in the chart below is that over the last year, we've added slightly more than 3,000 readers. That amounts to about one in 10 of our visitors. It has been an encouraging result, and we're hoping we can continue to grow. We've also been looking at our top stories and the type of issues people are most interested in. Some of the topics are among our most frequently debated, and some are newer subjects. So here is the top 10 list of articles the Red Blog saw the most traffic from in 2014. The Top 10 10. The Collar Check. In June, a co-worker helped out a co-worker who called the Red's safety hotline regarding a traffic stop. This led to a fascinating exchange about police practices, racial profiling and the culture of the police. 9. The Occupy Baltimore. This piece is part of an ongoing series on the Occupy movement. The housing crisis and lack of affordable housing is a serious issue in Maryland, and the Occupy movement provided a lot of unique perspective on the issue. 8. The Controversial Bid To Fire Maryland Public School Teachers. This piece examines the state's effort to fire dozens of teachers after the St. Paul's Elementary School mess in Baltimore. 7. The Death Of A Red. This was Red's tale of the 1995 public school bus crash that killed two Red state employees and several kids. The accident brought much scrutiny to the bus transportation system and the rules for busing teachers and students. 6. The Battle Over Democrats In State House Races. This piece is part of our ongoing series on the 2014 Maryland state House races. In 2014, voter suppression tactics and an electoral map ruled by money made it tough for the state's voters to vote for their choice for state House. 5. The Protest And Riots In Baltimore Over Freddie Gray's Death. This is the story of the Baltimore riots that erupted over the death of Freddie Gray, a Freddie Gray who
