Comparing Grayscale and RGB Images It's important to understand the difference between grayscale and RGB images. Although both types of images are composed of pixels, grayscale images use the same color for each pixel and RGB images use three colors to represent each pixel. * A grayscale image uses shades of gray for all the pixels in the image. It's essentially a black and white photo. * An RGB image uses red, green, and blue pixels for all the pixels in the image. The two approaches have different advantages and disadvantages. For example, grayscale images are less complicated to create and use. It's easier to use automatic tools in Photoshop to produce a good-looking grayscale image than it is to create a great-looking RGB image. However, grayscale images are harder to read because of the stark contrast between the dark and light areas. They're also very difficult to create in the darkroom. Contrast is increased tremendously in an RGB image, whereas grayscale images tend to have a somewhat muted look. An RGB image actually has more color information in each pixel than a grayscale image does. It's easier to notice subtle colors in an RGB image. The more colors there are in an image, the more interested someone is in looking at it. So, the more colors there are, the more clicks you get. The best approach to using Photoshop in a creative way is to learn to use all the tools, and be proficient with them. You'll find that it's not a one-size-fits-all situation.

1. Technical Field The invention generally relates to electrically driven vehicles and, more particularly, to a hybrid vehicle having regenerative braking capability. 2. Discussion Electric vehicles, such as hybrid vehicles, are known in the art. The term “hybrid” in reference to an electric vehicle describes a vehicle which incorporates both an electric motor for driving the vehicle, as well as a conventional internal combustion engine. The internal combustion engine is used as a prime mover for supplying torque to the wheels. The term “regenerative” is used to describe a process in which energy produced by the vehicle during braking is returned to the battery for storage. To provide for braking, conventional vehicles require the driver to depress the brake pedal. During braking, the vehicle will typically include hydraulic pumps and reservoirs coupled to a master cylinder. An additional hydraulic system includes separate high pressure and low pressure reservoirs which are also coupled to a master cylinder. The master cylinder is connected to the wheel brakes on the vehicle. During braking, both pressurized fluid within the master cylinder and fluid in the wheel brakes is used to brake the vehicle. Certain hybrid vehicles also include wheel brakes which are associated with a braking circuit, such as hydraulic brakes. The brakes further include a brake actuator comprising a piston and cylinder arrangement. Hydraulic fluid within a reservoir is supplied to both the master cylinder and the cylinder of the brake actuator. During braking, the hydraulic fluid is released from the cylinder of the brake actuator to provide the required braking force. Braking performance is augmented by adding a second reservoir, and appropriately operating the second reservoir to provide braking of the wheels to augment the braking force of the master cylinder. Hybrid vehicles have a number of advantages over conventional vehicles. These advantages include less carbon dioxide emissions, and a significant increase in fuel economy. However, certain disadvantages exist in hybrid vehicles, such as the need to regenerate energy at the wheels to recharge a battery associated with the electric motor. Regenerative braking results in the regeneration of energy at the wheel which can be returned to the battery. It is desirable to provide a hybrid vehicle having enhanced regenerative braking. Transcatheter aortic valve implantation: emerging applications and outcomes. Transcatheter aortic valve implantation (TAVI) is a new endovascular therapy that has evolved substantially in the last few years. In this report, we review the current literature on TAVI with the aim to report on the emerging applications and current outcomes of this technique. We performed a review of the literature and summarized the main indications for TAVI according to a predefined set of patient populations, and we compared the outcomes with surgical aortic valve replacement and conservative medical therapy. TAVI may be considered in patients at intermediate or high surgical risk, who are at high risk of undergoing surgery or in whom surgery is contraindicated. The initial results with TAVI have been very promising, with acceptable early and mid-term mortality and significant reduction in rates of major adverse events. Based on the current evidence, TAVI appears to be a valuable option in the therapy of patients at intermediate or high surgical risk, especially in lower-risk patients at intermediate or high surgical risk. Percutaneous valvular interventions such as TAVI can be effective in patients at high surgical risk.
