The basics of Photoshop can get a bit complicated, but Photoshop Elements has many features that will make your Photoshop editing routine a lot easier. Here are 10 reasons to switch to Photoshop Elements from your Adobe Photoshop. 1.

Cleaner interface One of the main advantages of Photoshop Elements over Photoshop is that you no longer have to navigate through a menu when editing your graphics. Image editing in Photoshop Elements is simple. All of the tools are in one place. You can open, edit and save images, crop, rotate and resize images.

You can even color correct images using Elements. From the editing window, select the Crop Tool. Click on the color scheme, and drag a rectangle around the area of the image you want to edit. Saving an image in Photoshop Elements is also easy. On the file menu, click on the Save button. Click on the File menu, and choose the Save As type. Under Save Image, choose a file name for your graphic, and a location where you want to save it. Click on the image, and the picture should instantly appear on the computer. Like Photoshop, Photoshop Elements is very powerful and you can easily edit your images. 2. Helps you design better websites The graphic design community loves Photoshop, so it is no surprise that designers are eager to switch to Photoshop Elements. Whether you are an independent web designer looking to make your own website, or a web designer for a company, Photoshop can be a pain to use. You need to know all the basics such as file type, size, resolution, color depth and format to get any job done.

After that, you need to know the menu options and find the right tools to edit that image and make it look as good as possible. The good news is, Photoshop Elements handles all of the same things you need to design a website. Unlike in Photoshop, all the tools are in the same place. You don't have to navigate through various menus and menus to find what you need to design a website. If you are using web designing programs such as Dreamweaver, Photoshop Elements is easy to use. 3. One of the principal reasons for the recent growth in the number and variety of services available via electronic communication is the ubiquity of computers. Individuals and organizations are as likely to want to communicate via personal computers as they are by telephone. The ubiquity of computers has resulted in a corresponding increase in the use of the Internet for electronic commerce and information dissemination. In the early days of the Internet, users accessed the Internet via personal computers and simple terminal devices, such as a modem. Within the last decade, users have accessed the Internet from a variety of electronic appliances including set-top boxes (such as cable TV, satellite TV, or digital radio receivers), hand-held computing devices (such as personal digital assistants, cell phones, and pagers), and personal computer-based systems (such as notebook and laptop computers). Other variations on computing platforms are also available. Typically, users of these various systems are provided with access to the Internet through an Internet Service Provider (“ISP”). Some ISPs also provide Voice Over Internet Protocol (“VoIP”) service to allow users to make telephone calls over the Internet. At present, there are two primary ways for a user of an Internet-based communication device to obtain media content. The first method is via point-to-point electronic communication between the provider of the media content and the Internet-based communication device of the user. In the case of VoIP, such point-to-point communication typically takes the form of packet switching and is facilitated by a specific, purpose-developed implementation of the transmission control protocol/Internet protocol (“TCP/IP”). VoIP is typically best suited to communication between two users who each have access to a device (e.g., a personal computer, a hand-held device, or a fixed telephone) capable of communicating using VoIP. The second method for the user to obtain media content is via distribution of the media content to the Internet-based communication device over a communication network. In this case, the media content is distributed using the communication network and is made available to recipients using the Internet-based communication device. In most cases, the communication network makes use of physical distribution networks including wires, fiber optics, or other infrastructure. While this method is most often used to distribute media content such as advertisements to a number of recipients, it may also be used to distribute media content such as software updates to various entities. The distribution of media content over a physical distribution network is commonly referred to in the art

OAKLAND — If a lawman patrolling the East Bay comes upon a truly amazing spectacle, like a beautiful blue butterfly fluttering along the ocean, he is not allowed to consume it to keep it. And if the lawman is a cop? He can't even photograph the butterfly without permission, according to a San Mateo County District Attorney's Office policy that's been in place since 2008. Such is life for the butterflies of San Mateo County. That makes San Mateo County among the first in the nation to give local law enforcement the power to confiscate any wild animal taken in by mistake, said the Mountain Lion Foundation, which administers the program with the San Mateo County District Attorney's Office. The Mountain Lion Foundation typically sets up a blue butterfly enclosure at San Mateo County law enforcement locations around the Bay Area, where the butterflies breed and learn to fly. There are about 40 such sites. "It's like the butterfly program for predators. It helps them learn to eat the insects that are making their lives difficult," said Mountain Lion Foundation Executive Director Karen Derrett. In the past, police had no legal authority to confiscate wild animals. But after three mountain lions were killed on Telegraph Avenue in Oakland, Mountain Lion Foundation officials decided to formalize the practice. "It is our hope that by encouraging mountain lions to spend time in the area, that we will avoid them being unnecessarily killed by motorists or farmers," she said. As a result, the Mountain Lion Foundation has now laid down a rule that law enforcement can confiscate any wild animal not native to California. The rule includes Native American hawks, goshawks, wolves, coyotes and cougars. State law enforcement now can also confiscate any wild animal seized under the Mountain Lion Foundation's program. The foundation began its program in 2008. The idea to create mountain lion enclosures came from a grandmother whose granddaughter fell into a dry well near her home in San Mateo County. "This was an extraordinary situation," Derrett said. "It was a very unusual situation for her and her family." Today, the Mountain Lion Foundation does not monitor every breeding area where the butterflies live. But the enclosures are large and normally situated near a road where a mountain lion might find itself stranded if it were to be released.
