Q: how to get the data dynamically from my database using php I have this code I want to get data from my database and store it in a table which I will take from a div. I'm beginner in php so, the code provided here have some logical errors, so can someone take a look and suggest some fixes on it to display the user from the database when the user enters username and password. Thank you. A: Change $sql = "SELECT * FROM baza WHERE Username ='$u' and Password ='$p'"; to: $sql="SELECT * FROM baza WHERE Username ='$u' AND Password ='$p'"; as you want both username and password to be compared. Put this : if($leto!=0){ while($dane = mysql_fetch_assoc($liti)){ echo $dane['Username']; echo $dane['Password']; } }else{ echo "Ybrz"; } as the last code within the condition block. and do not forget to change your code to use mysql_* functions since mysql is deprecated since 5.5.

Q: Why do we use sub2ind before calling sub2ind in Fortran? I saw that Fortran codes often use sub2ind and call sub2ind before accessing an element. For example: ... do i=1,n do j=1,n call sub2ind (m, n, 1) ... enddo enddo ... end subroutine For example we have a subroutine sub2ind which is : subroutine sub2ind (m, n, i) implicit none integer :: m, n, i ... end subroutine I want to know the purpose of this code so I did some research. My best guess is that it might help the execution time and it was once a very common practice in Fortran 90/95 time. What is your opinion? Is there any other reason? A: My best guess is that it might help the execution time This is the intended rationale but it is a partial explanation. The purpose of the sub2ind statement is for the compiler to do certain special optimization when accessing memory in a loop or whatever. What is your opinion? It is very much better and safer to use the indexing variables and their bounds. Is there any other reason? If you need to optimize, then the compiler is better at it than you are. A: The idea is that the compiler is able to make certain transformations in the code that it generates when it accesses memory. e.g. subroutine foo(x) implicit none integer :: x integer :: x[3] x(1) = x(2) + x(3) end subroutine Without sub2ind, the compiler would have to Generate separate accesses for the first three elements, Do the arithmetic to combine them into a single access, And then potentially perform a re-allocation of memory to make that array cover the
