when you get the solo chord reading, know that it is simply a signal for you to start improvising, and that you are not a trained musician. you've got an immense amount of freedom, and some of that freedom will be relative freedom. it's not that you will have absolute choice, it's just that you have a lot more freedom than you would if you were playing with a regular band. you are also creating an opportunity for audience members to express themselves. by the same token, you can help them out by letting them know what you're doing, so they can join in. saying "it's an a pentatonic solo," or something like that is also valuable, because most audiences will have a handle on what "pentatonic" means. saying it in a particular context can also make it more memorable. keep in mind that people will want to join in. all of these suggestions are for the purpose of listening to the solo and joining in. don't feel obliged to do so, but don't avoid doing so, either. listen to the solo, find your own musical ideas, and join in when you can. the biggest danger about improvising solos in front of an audience is that your solo will get a beat. i've heard audiences applaud the soloist with a rhythmic accompaniment, just like they might do in a rehearsed group. here's how you can deal with that: listening to the solo, you'll see how there are groups of notes in the solo that lead into others. say that there's a chord you want to play, and the solo just plays a series of notes leading into that chord. that is a cue to play the chord. here's how to do it: say it, say that the solo is playing a chord, and then as you play the chord in your solo, say the cue word ("it's a little chubby one"), and then start right into playing the actual chord. it's best to say the cue word first, and then play the chord that corresponds with it. 5ec8ef588b
